El Tod: Seldom Seen, Unfinished Business

El Tod, a town about twenty kilometres south of Luxor, is the site of ancient temples. It is probably best known for the Tod Treasure, an array of silver, lapis lazuli and golden fragments and artifacts discovered in the foundations of a Middle Kingdom Temple in 1936. The find was divided between the Louvre and Cairo. The materials show trade contacts with Afghanistan for the lapis lazuli, and Europe for the silver. Many scholars believe the silver artifacts show Minoan handiwork. Though most sources assume the treasure was deposited during the reign of Senwosret I, Barry Kemp and others believe the material was put there later. I've always wondered what such a valuable hoard was doing in ancient Djerty. Just before Covid put a pause to travelling, I visited Tod. It's well worth the detour on your road south.

A narrow road, with stacks of decorated blocks on either side, leads to the site. The temple is bordered on all sides by houses of the modern town. The ancient buildings are at a lower level, so that there's a sense of a secret, sunken garden, full of tall palms.

A small shrine or temple had existed at Djerty from the Old Kingdom, and there's evidence, in the form of a beautiful granite block, that Userkaf of the Fifth Dynasty had an interest in the site. By the Middle Kingdom, Montu and Sobek were the main deities. Very fine granite blocks remain from a temple built by Senwosret I. The lower part of a large and elegant barque station, built by Thutmose III, and refurbished by Seti I and other New Kingdom rulers, attests to the importance of the site over time.

The first thing visitors see is a dramatically decorated pronaos, not too big, in the best Ptolemaic style. It's surprisingly well preserved, even to a 'secret treasury.' Visitors can walk part of a processional route, once guarded by sphinxes, to the remains of Senwosret's sanctuary. All around are capitals and other decorative elements from what must have been a substantial Coptic church.

Fig. 4. An unnamed Ptolemaic pharaoh makes a series of offerings to the god

The piles and piles of blocks from various building programs fascinate me. Although the Antiquities Service has worked hard to clear the site and set the many fragments of decorated stone up on benches to preserve them, hundreds more still sit on the damp sandy soil. While there's lots of fun in searching through all the blocks of Coptic Church decoration, Ptolemaic inscriptions, cartouches of Hakor, and starry skies from the Middle Kingdom, it is sad to see these valuable blocks still resting, almost at random on the earth.

Sites like El Tod remind us all of the immense and vital work of the Antiquities Service and the Foreign Missions who work with them, in identifying, studying and preserving all these fragments of the past. Until someone can complete the work, a native son of El Tod guards the remains of the past.

DIGGING IN TO EGYPTOLOGY'S PAST AND PRESENT

A Hybrid Symposium (both In Person and Online)

This year we celebrate two significant anniversaries – 200 years since the decipherment of hieroglyphs was announced by Champollion, and 100 years since the discovery of the tomb of Tutankhamun. Our splendid speakers will lead us on a journey through time as we examine the development of Egyptology – from humble (and simplistic?) beginnings to present-day scientific, interdisciplinary approaches, and viewed from different perspectives.

Beginning with the West's discovery of ancient Egypt in the late 18th/early 19th centuries, Egyptology developed from curiosity of a few antiquarians to a discipline. Andrew Bednarski talks about the landmark publication, the Description de l'Egypte, and the impact it had on the European public. Andrew is co-author of A History of World Egyptology (2021), a book on the reception of the classic Description de l'Egypte in the West.

Jackie Jay, co-author of the recent publication, Archive of Thothsutmis, Son of Panouphis, will be discussing Champollion's decipherment of hieroglyphs, his trip to Egypt with the Franco-Tuscan expedition and what followed. She is followed by former Editor of the JSSEA, John Gee, who explores some early 19th century explorers/Egyptologists and where the material they excavated has ended up.

German Egyptologist Karl Lepsius was an early proponent of Champollion's method, and Katja Goebel will discuss his work, which is less familiar to North American audiences. She is followed by Meira Gold and Peter Der Manuelian, whose talks take us to the end of the 19th century. Meira has been particularly interested in the development of Egyptology in the second half of the 19th Century, and will introduce us to some lesser known contributors to early Egyptology like Josef Hekekyan. Peter Der Manuelian, joining us via Zoom from Harvard University, will be speaking on Flinders Petrie and George Reisner and their role in Egyptology's developing field methodologies. Kerry Muhlestein, currently director of the BYU Excavation Project (most recently in the Fayoum) will delve into Grenfell and Hunt and their famous finds of papyri.

While we have heard many times about the discovery of Tutankhamun and his remarkable treasure, we hear less about the famous discovery from an Egyptian perspective, something that Okasha El-Daly will discuss. And finally, Mohamed Ismael Khaled will bring us into the present, with insights into Egyptians in Egyptology, and current work being done. His talk will be our first Sally L.D. Katary Memorial Lecture.

DIGGING INTO EGYPTOLOGY'S PAST AND PRESENT

A Hybrid Symposium (both In Person and Online)

Cette année, nous célébrons deux anniversaires significatifs – voilà deux cents ans, Champollion annonçait avoir déchiffré les hiéroglyphes et 100 ans plus tard, on découvrait la tombe de Toutankhamon. Des conférenciers et conférencières chevronné(e)s nous guideront dans le temps à travers le fabuleux voyage du développement de l'Égyptologie depuis ses plus humbles et modestes débuts jusqu'aux plus récentes découvertes scientifiques à travers diverses approches interdisciplinaires et selon différentes perspectives.

Ayant débutée par la découverte de l'ancienne Égypte auprès des occidentaux à la fin du 18ème et au début du 19ème siècles, l'Égyptologie passera de simple curiosité alimentée par quelques antiquaires à une véritable discipline. Andrew Bednarski parlera de la publication phare, La description de l'Égypte, et de son impact sur le public européen. Andrew est le co-auteur du livre A History of World Egyptology (2021) qui relate la réception de cette publication classique sur l'Occident.

Jackie Jay, co-autrice de la récente publication Archive of Thothsutmis, Son of Panouphis, discutera du déchiffrement des hiéroglyphes par Champollion, du voyage de ce dernier en Égypte lors de l'expédition franco-toscane et ce qui s'ensuivit. Elle sera suivie par l'ex-éditeur du JSSEA, John Gee, qui présentera quelques explorateurs-égyptologues du début du 19ème siècle et le fruit de leurs fouilles.

L'Égyptologue allemand Karl Lepsius fut l'un des premiers partisans de la méthode Champollion et Katja Goebs discutera de son travail qui est moins familier pour l'audience nord-américaine. Elle sera suivie par Meira Gold et Peter Der Manuelian dont les présentations nous amèneront à la fin du 19ème siècle. Meira sera particulièrement intéressée par le développement de l'Égyptologie lors de la seconde moitié du 19ème siècle et nous introduira à des contributeurs moins connus de l'Égyptologie naissante comme Josef Hekekyan. Peter Der Manuelian, qui nous rejoindra par Zoom de l'Université d'Harvard, parlera de Flinders Petrie et George Reisner, et de leur rôle dans le développement des méthodologies de terrain. Kerry Muhlestein, présentement directeur du BYU Excavation Project (plus récemment au Fayoum) plongera dans les fameuses découvertes des papyri de Grenfell et Hunt.

Bien que nous ayons entendu parler à maintes reprises de la découverte de la tombe de Toutankhamon et de son remarquable trésor, nous n'avons que rarement entendu parler de cette découverte du point de vue égyptien, ce dont discutera Okasha El-Daly. Et finalement, Mohamed Ismael Khaled nous ramènera au présent en nous renseignant sur l'Égyptologie proprement égyptienne et les travaux en cours. Sa conférence sera la première présentation du Sally L.D. Katary Memorial Lecture.
